“Patience so that you’re not a Patient”

Michael Allawos, Principal Consultant

Patience, do you have any? Most of us don't and may never have it but it can be an acquired skill if we put our mind to it or you may learn the hard way and wind up as a patient in a hospital stressed out because you may be a perfectionist (great quality if its reality based) in your job, over achiever, or simply couldn't wait for that sale and lost it do to a lack of patience. Now that we have the spelling down between "patience" and "patient" we can move on.

We come from various walks of life that form us at an early age as well as traits that are in my opinion handed down to us from our parents that shape our mannerisms, thought processes, and how we may react to certain situations including learned behaviors of life's stimuli while growing up.

Recently I was trying to help a business professional understand what drove them to do what they did not only in their business but in life. The reasoning behind this exercise was to have the individual understand their driving force which is not a bad, it's simply an understanding of one's self. The next part of the exercise was to drill down exploring their life experiences that got them to their driving force and or word. For those inquiring minds that individual's word that drove them was "perfectionist".

It's amazing when we find out that one word that can describe us. It allows us to ask questions of ourselves and to uncover those triggers in our life that drives our behavior and correct them if we find them destructive or that they may interfere with our emotional and business growth.

So how does this have anything to do with the word patience, the topic of this discussion? We've all heard the saying "patience is a virtue" or "good things happen to those who wait".

Well I've never been a subscriber to those sayings; however, they must be put into context for business. Pushing a colleague or a client to hard or to fast can ruin relationships, put undue stress on yourself and those around you that could manifest into physical problems making you a patient, costing you time, money, relationships, your future, and your health which is invaluable and not replaceable.

So don't be a patient and have patience, grow your business and stay healthy.

Be bold, act nobly and above all be honest in your dealings. This is the key to success and happiness with no regrets.
